Don't Go Near The Water

With this, issue 49, The Nanjinger enters its sixth year of publication. An odd number, given that we produce ten issues per year, but explained by the fact that, due to our own then ineptitude, our first year only comprised eight issues.

With five years under our belt, it is time for an massive outlay of gratitude to all that have made this little rag possible. First vote of thanks must go to our advertisers, some of whom have been with us since day one, without whose faith this magazine would likely not exist or certainly would not be freely available for all.

Then there are the contributors; some staffers, some freelancers, some interns plus the volunteers who are simply happy to see their name in print; who now make up the strongest stable of writers of any English publication in China.

Last, certainly not least, we say a heartfelt thank you to our readers, whose encouraging feedback has, time and time again, encouraged to push through the frustrations involved in putting this to print each month.

Speaking of which, welcome to Sustainability from The Nanjinger.

A New Initiative

I must here apologise.

These words are not new,
But are recycled, reclaimed
Found in failed initiatives-
The broken, the cast aside.

This think tank does propose
We gather them, rescue them
Nurture them, give them time
Give them opportunity
And care.

Then might they take root;
Then in time may we uncover
Something worth learning,
Just maybe, hopefully
Something worth saving.

Letter Of The Month

Dear Nanjinger,

Why is the West missing the point about China and Mr Xi's overhaul?

Repression? Internet security? Protecting the citizen against militants? What utter nonsense. What it is plain and simple protectionism. Facebook and the like are blocked not because of worries over sensitive content – these are convenient excuses that serve to benefit home grown enterprises.

The Chinese Internet is awesome, and blindingly fast. WTO be damned.

But maybe I wonder if China's fears are founded in previous inside insecurities about their ability to compete on the word stage. That time is gone, and WeChat is no better proof that Chinese tech companies can, and are now easily able, to take on the cumbersome WhatsApps of this world.

Wake up everyone! Ulterior motives are at play.

CSR Good for business is good for us

BY SHAHNAZ MOUHAMOU

When the West thinks about China, the first things that come to mind are negative stereotypes; an uncontrollable hyper-capitalist economy wreaking havoc on the environment, corruption, and product and food safety scandals. The recent blasts in Tianjin have only further lodged international fears that China's rapid economic expansion is hurting the global community. However, the reality is much different.

China has made an extraordinarily rapid shift from a production source to a more mature consumer market. As a result, balancing economic development with protection of environmental resources has become a clear priority in both Chinese public discourse and government policy.

In the private sector, like other places in the world, the decline of resources combined with the rise of global transparency has led to a new standard in business, i.e. sustainability. While the heat of the corporate social responsibility (CSR) debate took shape in the west over 50 years ago, China has only begun its battle in the last decade.

Speaking with The Nanjinger, Shawna Tao, President of Icicle, China's first eco-fashion brand, took the time to explain the foundations of China's CSR culture.

"When the economy opened up in the late 70s the educated class stayed behind and observed the changes out of fear. The brave souls that charged ahead and seized the opportunities of an empty economy were the uneducated class with nothing to lose and everything to gain. The focus was on production, expansion and profit. Without education and with the memory of hunger driving them forward, the corporate pioneers of that era sacrificed our 5000-year-old values and got very rich very quickly. The consequences were pollution and corruption.... But, now is a great time in China. Bellies are full and the memory of hunger has been replaced with a more refined palate. Now that the void has been filled, and the young are being educated, we are starting to remember what is important. More and more companies striving to give back to the community have started appearing."

While Tao's optimistic outlook is reflective of the current trends in Chinese CSR efforts, they still have a long way to go. MNCs and SOEs have been quite effective at recognizing the benefits and integrating CSR strategies in their daily operations. However, a study carried out by the Centre for Corporate Social Responsibility points to SMEs lagging behind. Most SMEs do not yet fully understand the economic value of CSR despite the fact that it is become the central issue on contemporary business' agenda.

Incentives/Drivers

We must first seek to understand the drivers, as they are key for a business to fully comprehend the benefits and urgency in adopting a CSR platform.

Government Regulation and compliance is considered to be a key driver in the promotion of CSR. The Central government's 2006 Harmonious Society policy officially put forward sustainability and CSR as the over-arching strategic goal of the CCP. This was partly due to the increase of serious incidents causing social unrest, by an average of 29% per year. Since then, the concept of CSR has been entrenched in corporate and contract law, and mentioned in top-level speeches and official documents. The Chinese government has also strongly supported the absorption of CSR business models for its SOEs. It is clear that the government is taking CSR very seriously. Businesses need to implement changes as soon as possible if they do not want competitors to gain the upper hand. Furthermore, as policies to reduce greenhouse gas emissions are implemented, companies that fail to be proactive will find that their raw materials and energy costs will increase. These companies will spend more on risk management, as the cost of social and environmental irresponsibility will get out of hand.

The Role of MNCs and Global Competitive Advantage

International clients are another important driver of CSR development. The presence of MNCs has helped to introduce, improve and encourage Chinese organizations to adopt CSR. As MNCs are responding to global pressures and implementing stricter controls, Chinese companies along the supply chain are forced into following CSR guidelines to survive.

As China's economy continues to mature, businesses are looking to expand overseas. Out of the 500

Global Fortune companies listed in 2014, 95 were Chinese. During interviews carried out by the United Nations Global Compact, many Chinese business leaders emphasized the urgency for companies to evolve in the area of CSR if they want to succeed and remain competitive in global markets. As Chinese firms are now increasingly investing outside of China, companies that fail to implement CSR policies and practices will find themselves wrestling with consequences of the fallout in their host countries.

Civil Society, New Media and Public Opinion

Civil society is a major player in the promotion and implementation of CSR activities. As of 2009, with the opening up and allowance of civil discourse by the Central Government, more than 425,000 NGOs were seen operating in China. On one end, most are promoting "orderly" public participation in environmental and consumer matters. On the other, they are forming collaborations with corporations as the private sector is increasingly seeking guidance to improve their CSR performance. Ma Jun, Chief of the Institute of Public & Environmental Affairs (IPE) and well known environmental activist, is spearheading the public education movement by publishing available data on new media in an easy to interpret form.

With the emergence of new media, the speed and scope of information available online is making it easier for the digital-native youth to engage in discussions about contemporary issues. China boasts an impressive community of over 640 million Internet users, millions of which are also blogging. And according to research by PR company Edelman, Internet users are presently growing at an annual rate of 40 per cent. We live in an age where one faux pas can go viral and reach millions of users. Businesses can either falter or flourish at the whim of a click.

The last few years have witnessed a growing level of public involvement in CSR-related issues, especially with the new generation of environmentally conscious, technologically savvy millennials. An MSL Group survey that questioned 8,000 Generation Ys born between 1984 and 1996 around the globe, found that 92 percent of respondents in China believe corporate involvement is necessary in tackling social issues.

MSL Group Chief Strategy Officer Pascal Beucier says, "millennials look to businesses not only to lead, but to actively engage them in the process. This opens up huge opportunities for businesses worldwide to reset in the face of declining consumer trust." China has approximately 400 millennials who express themselves quite liberally on environmental and consumer concerns. They are an ambitious, self-confident group that represents the future of the country. 69 percent, the highest in the world, demand transparency on corporations' citizenship activities. "Brands that are socially active are perceived as forward thinking and responsible," said Ellen Cheng, MSL's Asia practice group lead for Corporate & Brand Citizenship based in Beijing. "This indicates that citizenship is a strong differentiating factor for brands: more than 83 percent of Chinese Gen Y would recommend a brand to friends or family because of its citizenship efforts."

The 5 Benefits

Chinese companies generally still struggle to see the business case for CSR. It is usually viewed as a part of wider PR, philanthropy or crisis management strategy. Businesses need to adjust to 21st century realities or they are on their way to becoming the proverbial frog. I have compiled below a list of five benefits a Chinese company can achieve from imbedding a sustainability strategy. But, I will let business leaders and industry professionals do the speaking.

Survival

"We're talking about a transformation of the economy, and when you transform economies, then some businesses win and some businesses lose."

Paul Gilding, Former Greenpeace Executive Director during an interview with Eco-Business, an Asia Pacific based media outlet covering sustainable business, ahead of the Responsible Business Forum on Sustainable Development.

"We firmly believe that businesses in the 21st century must take responsibility to help solve the problems of society. This is not only a moral duty, but also the foundation of our own survival and growth."

Jack Ma, in an open letter to the company's investors after unveiling the largest tech IPO ever seen.

"Even if they are motivated by profits, they will have no choice but to answer to the changing business environment and listen to what their stakeholders want. They may not want to but they must if they want to survive the next 5 to 10 years."

Shawna Tao, President of Icicle, China's first eco-fashion brand, speaking with The Nanjinger.

Social Capital and Brand Reputation

"Reputation is their biggest asset or their biggest potential liability."

Greg Babe, Former CEO Bayer Corp. in a Forward for Chris Laszlo and Nadya Zhexembaeva's book "Embedded Sustainability: The Next Big Competitive Advantage".

"A consumer is willing to spend more money on your brand if they consider you a meaningful brand." Maria Garrido, International Marketing Director for Havas, speaking with The Guardian.

"As it will soon be the norm for all products to be environmentally friendly and socially responsible, we believe a product's sustainability benefit will strongly differentiate a brand (akin to price, quality and effectiveness)."

2011 KPMG China CSR Report

Innovation

"Sustainability is not a constraint, it's a field of opportunities at every level. It creates value in multiple ways - efficiency, innovations in processes and product development."

François Pinault, Chairman and CEO of Kering, speaking with VOGUE UK

"Companies that are breaking the mold are moving beyond corporate social responsibility to social innovation. These companies are the vanguard of the new paradigm. They view community needs as opportunities to develop ideas and demonstrate business technologies, to find and serve new markets, and to solve longstanding business problems." Rosabeth Moss Kanter, Harvard Business Review.

"Market shifts create winners and losers, and companies must innovate to survive."

Andrew J. Hoffman, Professor and Associate Director of the Erb Institute for Global Sustainable Enterprise, in a Forward for Chris Laszlo and Nadya Zhexembayeva's book "Embedded Sustainability: The Next Big Competitive Advantage".

Human Resources

"Without talented, happy, diligent and passionately committed employees, our commitment to serving customers will be empty. A company that does not have satisfied employees will not have satisfied customers, and without satisfied customers, we could not possibly have satisfied shareholders."

Jack Ma, in an open letter to the company's investors after unveiling the largest tech IPO ever seen.

"Developing a strong CSR program that engages employees' enthusiasm in issues of individual interest is crucial to a firm's competitiveness, especially in attracting China's most talented professionals and keeping them aboard as alternative opportunities emerge."

The American Chamber of Commerce in Shanghai in their report "A Guide to Corporate Social Responsibility in China".

A total of 72 percent [millennias] want their employers to help enable them to get involved, while 84.9 percent "want to work for an active citizen."

MSL Group sourced from Jing Daily Magazine.

Direct Financial Impact

"The 10 per cent reduction in electricity is enough to power the annual consumption of 3 theme parks." – Disney's Climate Program

"Proactive environmental strategies can result in cost reduction, such as decreasing costs related to current and future legislation, and operational costs."

Residential Energy

By Scott Rainen

For most of August this year Beijing was unusually, eerily beautiful. Famous for the Forbidden City and China's most prestigious universities, the capital city of China also holds a dubious reputation as a hotbed for pollution. And yet, for about three weeks leading up to the September 3rd military parade, the skies were, for the most part, blue and virtually pollution-free. The parade came and went, and so did the blue skies.

How did this happen? Quite simply, because the Chinese government wanted it to. Through a series of restrictions on manufacturing, and cloud seeding to force pollutants out of the air via artificially induced rainfall, officials in Beijing were able to mandate clear skies for their soldiers' marching. Such a capability is in some ways terrifying, but from another perspective is oddly promising as governments around the world take climate change more seriously and try to reduce their emissions internally because, unlike many other countries, the Chinese government can force results in a way others constrained by the structure of their economies cannot.

China is polluted, and this is only becoming more exacerbated by an increasing standard of living. Recent surveys have indicated trends towards increased energy demands per household – particularly electricity – and fewer occupants per household. These factors can only lead to increased pollution. Obviously, households do not present the biggest contributor to pollution in China. The largest consumers of energy and emitters of pollutants are found in China's commercial sector. When the skies were cleared in Beijing, it was due to the capital's famed closure of large swaths of factories having a direct effect on the city's air. That said, as China's economy matures and more Chinese citizens are becoming comfortable with a more affluent lifestyle, the effect China's residential sector has on energy consumption is inflating at a rapid speed. Between 2000 and 2008, reports have indicated that residential electricity use tripled and the sector rose from 7 percent to 11 percent of the country's total energy consumption. This is the fastest rate of increasing energy intensity over any sector of the Chinese economy. Furthermore, these rapid rises in energy consumption are only predicted to continue.

As a result, the Chinese government is beginning to pay closer attention to the sustainability of its residential sector. Increasing energy consumption from this sector presents a difficult situation for the government because it cannot be controlled in quite the same way as, for example, manufacturing. With manufacturing, the government can simply order plants to shut down or use less energy. This can be mandated. With the residential sector this can also be done, but it is not as safe of a political decision.

As the Chinese Communist Party has largely abandoned many original ideologies, much of its legitimacy has become based upon China's continued economic growth and the people's gradually increasing standard of living.

While the government could, for example, ban air conditioning during the summer months, which would cause massive energy savings, this decision would be unpopular for obvious reasons, and thus Beijing needs to find other means of achieving energy-saving goals.

It should also be noted that it does appear these goals are being taken seriously. This summer China announced a pledge to curb peak emissions by 2030 and laid out a variety of actions with the intent of achieving that objective. That said, China has not just recognized its need for energy efficiency, as it has been continuously implementing new energy saving policies over the past two decades. With respect to buildings, China entered a third phase of developing its building code regulations in 2006. Each phase set out to improve the energy efficiency of new buildings, in addition to retrofitting old ones, and each phase also increased the stringency of enforced regulations. The gradual increase in required energy efficiency has also resulted in the industry's gradual adjustments to meet new needs. For example, buildings in the north of China, to combat the cold climate, have largely switched to double, and in some cases even triple, glass pane windows. The enforced regulations give the industries time to adjust to their new requirements, but also ensure that the drive continues moving forward.

These energy-reducing objectives in turn manifest themselves in a variety of interesting ways. Of course on one side China is not only trying to burn coal in a cleaner, more efficient way but is also investing in the research, development, and implementation of massive amounts of green technologies, such as solar power. As China is still developing its infrastructure, this is easier to do than in, for example, the United States, where energy production methods are limited by a well established, expensive to alter, energy grid. In people's homes, however, there are also major efforts afoot to decrease energy usage.

As mentioned above, efforts are being made to better improve the efficiency of buildings themselves. For example, according to a March 2014 report by the U.S. Department of Energy, policies mandated by China's 12th Five Year Plan are expected to spur investments of $35 to $43 billion USD on insulation alone. The profit margin of energy efficient doors and windows is 13 to 15%, far greater than the 3 to 5% boasted by their traditional counterparts. With pushes by the central government, this $60 billion USD industry is expected to slowly shift to a greener incarnation. The Chinese government is forcing similar measures upon the heating, lighting, and other elements of the residential sector as well. The result of these requirements and adjustments to the sector is the forced development of new industries to meet new standards, making the development of green products and materials in the economy more profitable. With mass production, implementation becomes increasingly affordable, and so on.

Of course, there are critics. Professorial candidate Lin Lishen, studying under Professor Jiangyi of Qinghua University, specializes in household energy efficiency. In an interview for The Nanjinger, he stated that while the government's response to energy production is gradually improving, it is not enough. "China should consider total energy use, not just energy efficiency – they are two different things." But this is not the case, as he points out more antiquated central heating is being used today than before. This is linked to people's inflated expectations for their standard of living, but the increased outputs are also producing unwanted results. "If the pollution becomes more serious, the people will lose faith in their government," he points to last year's winter, which was a case in point, stoking people's concerns over pollution and PM2.5. "After the heavy pollution of last winter the government invested more money to deal with the environmental problem" – but he thinks such investments are still far from enough.

It should be stressed that the Chinese people are not oblivious to the harmful effects of pollutants, and many are increasingly willing to make some form of a contribution to alleviate the smog descending upon their cities.

With better education, leisure time, and a generally more comfortable, stable standing that economic development has afforded the people, more citizens are becoming increasingly worried about the effects of pollutants on their bodies. That said, while there are some outspoken groups about environmental issues in China, perhaps the most appropriate way to describe the population is receptive to energy-saving suggestions. The government has made some efforts to tap into this receptiveness by labeling and providing education with the hope of spurring buyers into choosing energy-efficient products. Still, in the usual interest of stability, it wants to avoid fear mongering and has tried to keep alarming reports of pollution out of the public eye.

What the Chinese populace ultimately seems to want most is a better life. While they are willing to help with the country's energy-saving objectives, they seem most keenly interested in keeping their homes heated during the winter and cool during the summer.

They want blue skies and fresh air, of course, but such aspirations can sometimes be obfuscated in the daily rhythm of living – that is, living comfortably.

Lin Lishen points out, however, that such aloofness does have a limit. The terrible levels of pollution the Chinese people have experienced in recent winters bring the situation into sharp focus: the pollution needs to be controlled. For him, and many, it is a question of protecting the international environment: the amount of global warming needs to be kept under a mean two degrees rise in temperature, hence his assertion that "in the future the Chinese government should give a stronger target [than 2030 to curb emissions]." For the Chinese people it is one of basic safety, and for the Chinese government it is one of maintaining a satisfied population and stable condition for society.

Regardless, the desire is there from both the top down and the bottom up. The Chinese government jointly recognizes the need for a cleaner, more efficient, even low-carbon economy because it will entail less pollution and require fewer resources, ensuring more stability for the present and the future. From the bottom up, the people quite simply want clean air. The fact that the Chinese government seems keen to act decisively on such issues speaks to some exciting prospects for the future. China has the potential to both curb its pollution and kick start a genuine, competitive renewable energy industry that could also potentially provide a model for the rest of the world to follow. Whatever the result, the jury is still out, but China appears to be gearing itself up to impress the world with more than just the uniformity of its marching soldiers.

GLOBAL INITIATIVES; LOCAL ACTION

By Frank Hossack

Sustainability is an ugly word. Not for its meaning, but for the way politicians have been using it for years. The more cynical among us are now bound almost to switch off at its very mention. Not going in its favour is also the fact that sustainability, at least at the global level, does not really sound very interesting.

Nowhere is this more true than with the United Nations announcement of Sustainable Development Goals (SDGs); a new, universal set of goals, targets and indicators that UN member states will be expected to use to frame their agendas and political policies over the next 15 years. The SDGs are a replacement for the Millennium Development Goals (MDGs), agreed by governments in 2001 and about to expire, which in hindsight had glaring omissions (e.g. gender equality) and were inconsiderate as to the holistic nature of development.

Into a world where one billion people still live on less than US$1.25 a day (a measure of poverty by the World Bank) come the SDGs, all 17 of them (source: sustainabledevelopment.un.org):

1. End poverty in all its forms everywhere
2. End hunger, achieve food security and improved nutrition, and promote sustainable agriculture
3. Ensure healthy lives and promote wellbeing for all at all ages
4. Ensure inclusive and equitable quality education and promote lifelong learning opportunities for all
5. Achieve gender equality and empower all women and girls
6. Ensure availability and sustainable management of water and sanitation for all
7. Ensure access to affordable, reliable, sustainable and modern energy for all
8. Promote sustained, inclusive and sustainable economic growth, full and productive employment, and decent work for all
9. Build resilient infrastructure, promote inclusive and sustainable industrialisation, and foster innovation
10. Reduce inequality within and among countries
11. Make cities and human settlements inclusive, safe, resilient and sustainable
12. Ensure sustainable consumption and production patterns
13. Take urgent action to combat climate change and its impacts (taking note of agreements made by the UNFCCC forum)
14. Conserve and sustainably use the oceans, seas and marine resources for sustainable development
15. Protect, restore and promote sustainable use of terrestrial ecosystems, sustainably manage forests, combat desertification and halt and reverse land degradation, and halt biodiversity loss
16. Promote peaceful and inclusive societies for sustainable development, provide access to justice for all and build effective, accountable and inclusive institutions at all levels
17. Strengthen the means of implementation and revitalise the global partnership for sustainable development

Still awake? At least one accountant was, at a major conference in Addis Ababa a few months ago, that had the theme of financing the SDGs. The concern to emerge was there would not be enough financial stimulus available to meet such lofty goals.

In fact, an intergovernmental committee of experts on sustainable development financing have put the cost of providing a social safety net to eliminate extreme poverty at approximately US$66 billion per year. That's not all; to improve the overall infrastructure that the SDGs call for (those in water, agriculture, transport and power) could require a further US$7 trillion.

Obviously, that kind of money does not exist, even in China. Therefore, it is really up to us, as the little people. If we all make a few small changes at the local level, great things can be achieved. Indeed, it seems as if a seismic shift is already underway, as initiatives undertaken by individuals, pressure groups or even artists, are beginning to make our world look very different, and to a greater or lesser degree, more sustainable for those who follow in our footsteps.

The shanty towns of central Mexico would not be the obviously place to start looking for sustainability. Of late, however, an artists' collective calling themselves the German Crew have worked for more than a year with the goal of promoting community integration and changing the negative image of the hillside neighbourhood of Las Palmitas. The muralists have painted the drab, cement and cinder block facades of 200 homes all manner of colours; from lime and lavender to orange and sky blue, turning the hillside into one giant, colourful mural.

Before the artistic experiment in social behaviour, Las Palmitas was a place where people avoided going out after dark or talking with each other. Now people are beaming in conversation and children hang out on the steep stairways that crisscross the neighbourhood.

The world of advertising too, is not one immediately synonymous with sustainability. Yet, the proliferation of outdoor advertising can consume a city in the form of visual pollution. Brazil was perhaps where the advertising growth of the early 2000s was most intense, with signage in São Paulo becoming akin to a kind of smog.

As a result, in 2007 a Clean City Law was introduced that banned billboards outright. Authorities would then go on to remove 15,000 billboards and 300,000 oversized storefront signs. São Paulo was not to be alone in its crusade. Chennai, then Grenoble, Tehran, Paris and now even New York have all begun their own mission to replace or ban outdoor advertising. Already several US states, including Vermont, Maine, Hawaii, and Alaska are billboard free.

It should be noted that artists and activists are playing important roles in the move to clean up our increasingly obtrusive urban skylines. They are the ones who have realised that while the removal of a lot of large signage is generally positive, what is left in its wake is also cause for concern. Many cities in China would serve as good examples wherein outdoor advertising is actually brightening up what would otherwise be depressingly grey concrete slabs. Therefore, imagine what cities would look like if classical paintings replaced the ads; No Ad is an augmented-reality app that strips the New York City subway of ads, replacing them with art.

Nanjing too has its own unique example of efforts at sustainability that operate on the local level. The European Chamber of Commerce Nanjing Chapter shall hold its second CSR Award on 11th November. The Award aims to acknowledge CSR successes, raise sustainability awareness, and share CSR experiences with organizations looking to embrace corporate responsibility in China.

After a hugely successful first run last year, this year's event follows much the same format, with awards in the categories of human resources and work safety, sustainable growth and environment protection, plus community program and social innovation. There will be two winners from each category; one for Small and Medium Enterprises (SMEs) with less than 250 employees, and the other for corporations with more than 250 employees. In 2014, the Award attracted 17 projects and 200 diverse participants. Five projects won the CSR Award.

This year, all the entries will be assessed in a two-stage process by a jury representing a wide variety of businesses, social organisations, and government entities. During the first stage, the assessors, who are the experts in the CSR field, will shortlist all the entries to three finalists in each category. During the second stage, the finalists will be invited to make a 30 minute presentation with a 10 minute Q&A session on their project in front of a panel of judges, who will select the final winning projects.

To increase participation and spread awareness, students from both Chinese and international schools are invited to enter a competition that seeks poster designs on the themes of air, water, food, environment and sustainability. The Chamber plans to make the top three posters of each category into postcards. All revenues derived from the postcard sales will be donated to the Pfrang Association. Another competition seeks CSR Trophy designs where, through an open voting system, the top six trophy designs will be presented to the winners of the CSR Awards 2015. The designers' name and affiliation shall be carved on the trophy pedestal.

Visit www.europeanchamber.com.cn for further information on the contests and the CSR Awards.

FOR ART'S SAKE

Export Through the (Nonexistent) Gift Shop

WITH FRANCESCA LEIPER

Negotiating the ticket system in Chinese museums can be confusing, and the Jiangsu Museum of Art was no exception. After pleading with the ticket attendant to grant me entrance to this scarcely populated gallery without my passport, I was eventually handed a glossy golden ticket.

Leaving the attendant to her morning nap, I entered the first gallery of landscape paintings by Fan Baowen from the early 2000s. The ink paintings were colourful and pleasant, but the accompanying text was little more than dates and place names and only in Chinese.

As an avid museum goer, I was discouraged to find the majority of visitors in fact gathered on the dingy benches between exhibits, their faces illuminated by Wechat moments. But I also sympathised with them. I struggled to find the connection between Fan's work and the second room of the exhibit: a hodgepodge of works from artists roughly contemporaneous with Fan. Instead, I was distracted by poorly maintained paintings and peculiar MDF frames stapled directly to the walls.

One visitor who was enjoying the exhibition asked a staff member where she might be able to purchase a catalogue. The museum does not have a shop, she was told, and apparently one must have personal contact with the deceased artist in order to get any such publication.

Why, I wonder, was it so difficult to feel culturally and artistically fulfilled in what should be Jiangsu's most prestigious art institution?

Surely there are other Chinese culture enthusiasts who are asking this question. Those who have been in China in the past few years may be aware of the recent museum boom, in which a staggering number of museums and galleries have been, and still are, established on an almost daily basis. However, while China may be leading in quantity, many of its museums lag far behind in quality.

In an interview in the Journal of Contemporary Chinese Art last year, director of the Xi'an Art Museum Yang Chao helps us understand China's enigmatic museum landscape. While there is no end to the flow of money from the government into this sector, the motivation behind the building of museums in China and the allocation of funding is unsustainable. Art museums are often seen as a necessary element in any respectable city, rather than as a living and growing project. Once the building is erected, the tap switches off.

This idea that culture can be bought like a commodity, by simply constructing a splendid building, is one of the obstacles faced by art museums in materialist China. In fact, the building is only the first step in a museum's long life of collecting, scholarship and developing its public programme. Adding to this is the reluctance to invest in projects which are not for profit. Yang believes in thirty years many of China's recently established museums will be gone.

So, as numbers at the Jiangsu Museum of Art dwindled, I found myself unusually keen to join the 11 o'clock lunch brigade and made a beeline for the "Export". Forty-minutes on the bus to AMNUA, the Art Museum of Nanjing University of the Arts, and I feel as though I have travelled across the globe to a gallery in London. I am enticed by the modern yet severe building with sculptures scattered around the campus, left exposed to the elements making them somewhat synonymous with their surroundings.

Inside a maze of pleasing white spaces, I find a compact and capturing exhibition of prints demonstrating the 1930s and 1940s woodcut movement spearheaded by Lu Xun, one of China's most celebrated 20th century intellectuals. The black and white prints are striking, while the exhibition as a whole is a refreshingly original approach to marking 70 years since war ended between China and Japan.

There is a real sense that AMNUA is closely engaged with the art scene in Nanjing, China and the world. With six new exhibitions due to open this month, advertised on slick posters, I most certainly will be back. As for the Jiangsu Museum of Art, I am happy with my nice new bookmark. Hopefully one day I can use it to mark a page in my newly purchased catalogue.

Fame!

Warm Ups & Cool Downs

any moons ago, a young man of supreme physical fitness used to play rugby. He did alright on the field but his real ability lay in his unique agility and explosive, dynamic movement when rein-acting the famous scene from FAME; he would jump, nay leap, on to parked cars with wild abandon, after the post-match obligatory “cool-down” session at the club house.

This week, that same man discovered that he does not possess that same fitness anymore, as his knee cap popped out whilst pounding the pavement, and dodging a car, whose driver would more than likely fail an eye test - never mind a driving test.

Thanks to the good people at Global Doctor, it was slotted back in with a quick jab (shout out to you Dr. Eduardo.. sorry about the language).

The whole episode has left me a little, well... depressed. I feel old. My body is failing me. My mind is telling me yes but my body...my body's telling me NOOO (is that from a song?)

Research tells that our fitness goes in to rapid decline after 40, and more so if you're a man (thank you very much). Could years of half-hearted warm ups and “club house cool-downs” ie. none. be catching up with me?

If you look at the field of research in terms of warm ups and cool downs, views and fashions change rapidly and can be conflicting. Warm-up/cool down research is about as conclusive as food fads: one minute we're juicing everything we can get our hands on. Next minute we're eating solid pats of butter; okay, just me then, but you know what I mean.

Right now, I can tell you that static stretching is no longer considered de rigueur. A static stretch would be gradually easing in to a stretch position and holding it for a length of time. Many studies show this to have no effect on preventing injury what so ever. And one study shows it actually decreases performance in certain sports, including jumping. Static stretching is more appropriate as a cool-down. Science agrees though that we definitely do still need to warm-up.

So, we are not talking just some casual leg swinging and arm flailing and not just a 1 minute spurt on the bike. Your warm up needs to increase your body temperature; ie. do what it says on the tin and literally warm up your body. It also needs to mobilise and stabilise certain joints, fire up your nervous system, and replicate the movement patterns going to be used in your workout. Basically, these days we're all about dynamic stretching. Even the Arthritis Foundation recommends dynamic stretching to ease joint pain. Handy, since arthritis is apparently my destiny (thanks, Dad)!

I will give you a basic dynamic stretching warm-up example here but it is worth researching warm- up routines for your specific activity. A warm-up routine will look different for a runner, a football player or a shot-putter. That said, here is a solid general warm up for your average gym go-er.

Perform each movement 2-3 times, for approximately 10 meters . Either walk back to the start as a brief recovery and repeat again, or repeat on the way back before changing to the next stretch.

1. Legs - Walking Straight Leg Swings. Here, the leg acts as a pendulum and the opposite arm as a counter balance. From your starting position with the abdominals “switched on” and focusing straight ahead, swing the leg and opposite arm forward back forward before stepping through. Watch that the hips remain facing front and there is no excessive hyperextension or curve in the back while the leg swings back.

2. Arms - Upper Body Rotation. Bend at the hips, keep the back's natural curve and bend the knees a little. Rotate your trunk and stretch your arm to the opposite toe. Bend the leg you aim for. Alternate sides.

3. Knees - Walking Knee To Chest. Pick a focus point straight ahead and switch your abdominals on, helping to stop the body coming forward when you lift the knee. Stepping forward, lift the opposite knee to your chest and give it a gentle pull with your hands before striding through and repeating on the other side.

4. Ankles - Walking Ankle Lunges. The key point here is to pivot the back foot before lowering the body weight. Step forward on an angle, about 45 degrees, opening up through the groin. Pivot the back foot then drop the back knee while raising the arm. Make sure the front knee is at 90 degrees and directly above the ankle. Step through changing arms and legs.

5. Back - Laying Backward Bend. Lay on your stomach. Raise your trunk up using the muscles of your arms and back. Do not become static at the end of this exercise; let yourself drop back down as soon as you reach the end of the motion.

So, as I stare down the tube of an MRI scanner, contemplating the light at the end of the tunnel, feeling every bit my age and facing the reality that since all cardio activity is suspended for me right now, I have the choice of laying off the pork-scratchings or accepting that my belly will become a new home for balancing remote controls or beer tankards. The message is clear: Neglect the warm-up at your peril.

20 The Apogee Of
WINE EXPRESSION

In its 19th century heyday, Chile's success as a wine grower was largely courtesy of diseases in the shape of phyloxera and downy mildew crippling the rest of the world's crops. Thereafter the great blight, things stagnated for the next 100 years, and it took a return to democracy in the early 1990's to catapult Chile towards the top table through a determination to modernise. A legacy of the golden era though, where the wine industry was owned by just 10 families, is that wine viticulture still resides in the hands of the elite, and the natives, until very recently, not taking too much interest in their own wine with it being historically targeted for foreign consumption. Domestic apathy, however, has been bypassed in the modern era by an influx of outsiders nosing out the rich pickings, with some even setting up shop en route further catalysing the export outlook, a good chunk of which makes its way out of Chile and into China bearing the marques of Rothschild and the ubiquitous Spanish winemaker, importer, distributor Miguel Torres, among others. Chile still exports at last 70% percent of its wine production.

By far the most important red varietal in Chile is Cabernet Sauvignon, accounting for nearly a third of vines planted, though it is Carmenère which takes the mantle as Chile's "signature" grape. For many years, Carmenère remained hidden, classed as Merlot, another Bordeaux grape which still has a strong presence in Chile but retains a much stronger one in France. Carmenère though, also a French migrant truly lucked in with a passage to Chile, being a late-ripening variety and needing long periods of sunshine and dependably warm summers to thrive. The grape has largely withered in its erstwhile home, but in Chile, at its best, Carme-nère has the plumpness and affability of Merlot along with the more herbaceous cedary notes of a good Cabernet, though it was only formally identified as distinct from Merlot as recently as 1994. It arrived in Chile like all the best travellers, incognito, and the Chileans are rightfully proud of being its saviour if only through the serendipity of a conducive climate and a bright spark from the Montpellier school of Oenology.

Along with other prescient players in the wine game, I have always taken a shine to Chilean wine, finding it invariably to fall within the parameters of good to very good, and, always, great value. On which note, surely as seismic as the recent dreadful earthquake (which miraculously left the wine industry pretty much intact) is the news that supermarket juggernaut Wal Mart has somehow surpassed the value scale, even for Chile, and procured a very drinkable crop from Chile's Valle Central for just ¥39 a pop. The Cabernet hit the shelves some time ago delivering a benign, but no means bland, liquid which meanders pleasingly over the tongue with a trace of blackcurrant; a pepperoni pizza would kick it into even better shape and the recent 2013 tasting shifts it half a point north from previous incarnations (14.5 points). The Cabernet is now joined on the shelf by a Carmenère and a Merlot, both being badged "Special Selection" and both from the 2013 vintage. First up the Carmenère; this is rich, juicy and jammy with a touch of green pepper, which all left me inexplicably in want of a mince pie though, aside from that curious compulsion, the wine could accompany anything from a spaghetti bolognese through to a rare steak, and a real revelation for the price (15.5 points). Then the Merlot announced itself with the soft notes of the much vaunted plum descriptor for the grape, thus wrapping the tongue in warm flecks of supple dark fruit. This is as versatile a food wine as its colleague but could also take in a ripe brie with some panache, the wine being just a little tart at the finish (15 points). The threesome all makes for a very complete evening in for a tad over a tenner. NU

CHINESE DREAM PROJECT

The 57th Ethnic Group

By Nan Yuanfeixue

Marziye, is a Uyghur girl from Urumqi, the capital of Xinjiang Uyghur Autonomous Region. She is also a freshman in Nanjing University, along with 31 other Uyghur freshmen.

Marziye started learning Chinese when she was in kindergarten on her own initiative. Then her mother sent her to the Chinese class to provide her a better learning environment. The result of studying in Chinese for nearly 20 years is the low ability in her mother language. “I have poor hand writing with my mother language,” said Marziye, who doesn’t want her full name being given out, “I even forget some of the Uyghur words.”

“It’s a shame that you can’t speak your mother language fluently and appropriately. So that your Uyghur peers, especially those who study in mother language would despise you,” said Marziye.

She has been under long-term pressure for her poor performance on her mother language. Some Uyghur students believe that she has a bad upbringing and weak belief, which is not true; based only on the fact that she speaks Chinese more often in daily life. Instead of the misunderstanding from others, she was raised in a decent family. Her father is a member of Xinjiang Ensemble while her mother is a professor in Xinjiang University, and her uncle, being mentioned many times by her, is an imam who devotes himself in eliminating extreme in Uyghur society.

Marziye attended a great number of activities on campus and won the best hostess prize this semester. She is active, easy-going, popular, but busy. She may spend time with Han friends who share the same interests with her, but seldom has time to sit down and talk to her Uyghur peers. She seems to have less interest and energy in socializing with them. That makes it hard for her to make close Uyghur friends in school. “It’s hard to fit in the Uyghur group. I hope someone can invite me to the party, but no one comes. I feel lonely,” said Marziye.

“The 57th ethnic group” is a new expression created for Uyghurs who assimilate to Chinese. If you act “too Chinese”, such as dressing yourself in a short skirt or speaking Chinese to your Uyghur peers, you could be regarded as a member of “the 57th ethnic group”. The phrase is a reference to the fact that there are 56 ethnic groups officially recognized in China. It means that people like Marziye are banished by their compatriots, but not in an official way.

Anna, a junior at Nanjing University, is from Kumul, said she was once called “the 57th ethnic group” face to face by a Uyghur peer. She considers it as a malicious joke. She uses “immature”, “ill-bred” and “poor grades” to describe those who use this expression. “I don’t want to live under others’ judgments. I don’t care about what they say about me,” said Anna, who prefers to be introduced with her English name. Dressed in a short skirt, she is a fashionable girl with long curly hair and adorable make-up. Before our conversation, she was by the basketball court watching her Uyghur friend’s competition. “If I know almost all the Uyghur undergraduates in Nanjing are there on the court, and some girls wear long sleeves, trousers and scarves; they would not wear a short skirt like this,” she said.

Conflict lies between Uyghur young people who learn their own language and those who learn Chinese. Each side insists that the other side is not friendly and is full of misunderstandings. The quarrel can be irritated by inconsequential details easily.

Marziye was a little afraid of talking in the Muslim canteen at first due to her friend’s experience. One of her Uyghur friends once spoke Chinese in the Muslim canteen to a student who is from the Hui ethnic group. Then that friend received a Wechat message from another Uyghur student telling her “please speak Uyghur in the Muslim canteen.” Marziye called the note “ridiculous and unreasonable.”

At the beginning of the autumn semester in 2014, all the Uyghur undergraduates in Nanjing University were planning to hold a welcome party for the freshmen. While most of them agreed to decorate the stage with colorful flashing lights, a small group of more conservative Uyghur students opposed it. They thought it would make the stage look like a nightclub. In their opinion, swaying one's body too energetically during dancing offends public decency.

With the colorful flashing lights shining above the stage, the conservative students left the event quickly after the dinner. Then one of them wrote an obscure article in an ironic tone and published it on the Internet to remind others not to forget Uyghur tradition and Islam belief, which made others angry.

Uyghur is the fourth-biggest minority ethnic group in China and one often in the news. The few radicals want independence but others, as well as the Chinese government, do not. Extremist Uyghur nationalist have carried out bombings and other fatal attacks. Terrorist incidents and bloody clashes happen frequently. In the last few decades, the word "Uyghur" usually appeared with "violent, bloody, terrorist, extremist" in the news.

Given the complicated and tense condition in Xinjiang, the government enacts very different education policies in order to gradually create what they called "a cohesive and harmonious Xinjiang in the future."

As a student from minority ethnic group, one has three learning patterns to choose. In the first type, students takes all courses in Chinese in high school plus compulsory English classes and sits the Chinese Gaokao. In the second type, student takes all courses in Chinese except literature, which is taught in mother language, and sits the Chinese Gaokao without the high demands for English grade. In the third variety, Uyghur students attend high school outside Xinjiang in other provinces.

Some Uyghurs tend to believe that it is the education policy that leads to discrimination among the Uyghur students. Those who study in Chinese school might tend to regard themselves as the elites in their ethnic group. On the contrary, others might regard them as traitors.

Those Uyghur students who learn in Chinese may feel that they stand between the Uyghur group and the Han group, and it's difficult for them to find a balance. "Many people think that they are standing in the intermediate zone, but they are not. Because deep in their heart, they keep too many conservative things to provide them a way to escape," said Marziye.

Marziye is eager to learn the Uyghur language and culture. She and her Uyghur boyfriend decide that every Monday is "mother language day." On that day, they speak Uyghur all day and her boyfriend helps her with her speaking and writing. "No matter if I make mistakes or I even don't know how to speak, he would help me with patience," said Marziye.

Many other Uyghur undergraduates are trying to get closer to their own culture while in Nanjing.

Uyghur girl Rayle Abdukerem was born and raised in Kashgar Prefecture, the biggest city in southern Xinjiang, also a more conservative region compared to the northern part. In her hometown, Uyghurs were the majority until members of the dominant Chinese Han ethnicity came into the city to work. The first time she saw a Chinese face, she was 7 years old and she cried out of fear. In order to teach children only Uyghur language and culture, some families secretly keep their kids at home instead of sending them to Chinese-run schools.

Rayle likes to hang out with her Uyghur friends. They go out for dinner at least once a month and sometimes bring Uyghur music to KTV so that they can dance along it instead of Chinese or English pop songs. Rayle also lays a Uyghur carpet in her dormitory room in order to make it more Uyghur style.

"I will go back to Xinjiang after graduation," said Rayle in a firm voice at the end of our conversation. Life in Xinjiang would be easier for her, including getting a satisfying job without suffering from discrimination, finding an appropriate husband with less effort, and staying with her family instead of being lonely in the big modern city.

Compared with Rayle, Anna feels more comfortable living in Nanjing. She plans to continue her education in Nanjing University including both Bachelor and Master degree. "Nanjing is more cosmopolitan and modern, and I can absorb fresh ideas here," said Anna.

Though people have different preferences and choices, there is always something to stick on. "My mind is entangled with both conservative and liberal attitudes," said Marziye, "but I will never forget who I am. I am a Uyghur."

Water at the Tipping Point

According to a tiny sample (11) of visitors to Nanjing, drinking water accessibility and quality is “moderate” but general levels of water pollution are “high”. To an even tinier sample (me), walking in the sticky dusk to the metro over the bridge, the smell is that of an open sewer, and the view is of sheets of slime, floats of “algal blooms” as nature consumes the nitrogenous organic matter and oxygen then converts it to green matter on the water surface.

Environmentally speaking, China is poised at a fork in the road. The sentiment is there, and the laws are increasingly in place, but can they be enforced?

There is no such thing as a free lunch as they say, and feasts are common in China, as are free clean water both to drink and rivers for waste disposal, trees, fuel, soil, even spectacular views. For years, we have taken water quality for granted, and valued it as priceless in the sense that it was believed such “ecosystem services” as the jargon goes, were impossible to value. Recently, however, the argument has been made that giving an actual monetary value to these will make humans appreciate them more. Of course that is difficult, some would say impossible, but the sums have to add up, or future generations will pay that price.

Take a look through China’s recent history; water quality stayed stable until the economic boom of the late eighties, then started falling slowly through the nineties, finally plummeting off the scale by the mid 2000s. For example, Erhai Lake in Yunnan has seen its water quality drop severely in the last couple of decades, especially with the rapid development of Xiaguan (New Dali) and its accompanying water pollution from sewage, industrial waste, and excess fertilizer use on fields and in fish farms.

You may ask if this is necessarily a bad thing. Urbanisation and increased food productivity has been one of the factors responsible for lifting millions of rural Chinese out of poverty. Does it really matter if the natural environment takes a bit of a hit? The answer may be yes if the damage reaches a tipping point; if water quality changes prove to be irreversible.

The extent to which China can repair its environment and how long it will take are very relevant questions. For air pollution, the robust implementation of new and existing regulations and technology would go a long way to reversing the damaging trends. But for water pollution in lakes and rivers, the situation is more complex. In Lake Tai, en route to Shanghai, for example, more than the equivalent of US$16 billion has been spent on preventing the entry of nutrients into the lake and on algal bloom controls since 2007, but such blooms still reoccur almost every year.

China’s recent efforts to tackle these issues are immense and ambitious. The new environmental protection law that took effect in January 2015 is the strictest to date; the dragon fangs are showing. Severe punishments include criminal charges being brought against 740 polluting businesses, and 782 were punished with police administrative detention. Some 292 cases incurred an accumulating daily fine within the first 6 months, totaling 236 million yuan (US$37 million). Perhaps most importantly, local governments are cooperating with the new law; impotent officialdom may be a thing of the past.

Ecological considerations must come before GDP growth says the new law. You would not find the UK’s David Cameron saying this, and certainly not Jeb Bush. As Xi stated in 2013, “We have to understand that to protect the environment is to preserve our productivity and to improve the environment is to develop our productivity. Such concepts should be deeply rooted.”

Not many products are heavier at the moment we throw them away than when we bought them. Yet, this is a characteristic tea leaves share with nappies/diapers and helium balloons.

It is water that seeps into dried tea leaves, untangling, engorging and sinking them. Water reaches progressively deeper into a leaf, leaching out the compounds therein, broadcasting their flavour, colour and aroma.

Water is not a by-product of tea consumption nor merely the vehicle for its enjoyment; water is 98 percent of what we put into our mouths and call 'tea'.

In The Dream of Red Chambers (红楼梦), Miaoyu (妙玉) famously quizzes Lin Daiyu (林黛玉) about the origin of the water used to brew the Lu An (六安瓜片) green tea they are drinking. Her careful storing of water collected from melted snow settled on the bowers of a flowering plum tree acknowledges that water has its own taste and that different waters have different tastes.

We may also add that different waters have differing degrees of complementarity to the 2 percent of tea solids absorbed in the steeped tea liquor, and that different characteristics in the water (temperature particularly) privilege the release of different compounds from the leaf.

The so-called "hardness" of water (the presence of absorbed calcium and magnesium, mostly) may "block" aspects of the infusion process as well as the flavours in the mouth. It may also add charm of its own.

But before we panic and ask ourselves whether we should be spending big money (or trekking into the mountains) to find "pure" or "artisanal" water worthy of our tea, I think we should pause. While it is not axiomatic that water pleasant enough to drink will also make good tea, this generally has been my experience.

It should be remembered that the hyper-sensitive Lin Daiyu fails to guess the identity of the "snow water"; even among the aesthetes and conceits of The Dream, this episode has a parodic aspect to it.

I still don't know exactly why "tie guan yin" (铁观音) tastes better here in China than it does back home in Wales. Filtering the tap water just seems to add more distortions again... perhaps it is something about the air...

I would say that the boiled tap water served in restaurants in Nanjing (as well as in train carriages and many work units) is much harder than ideal for infusing greens, but strangely acceptable for pu er's and reds. Then there are the heating elements in the water dispensers we have in our homes that are near impossible to clean; hot water emerging from therein probably worsening with the element's age.

Ultimately, I would say that the different tea liquors brewed from safe, potable water are usually different only by degree, adding that the differences are intriguing enough to merit further consideration.

Incidentally, the very last residue in the leaf need not be wasted. In the case of green tea, it is pleasant to squeeze the leaves on your face or hands. Long recognised as a Chinese beauty trick, this eeking of the last drops of water certainly feels soothing on the skin!

Jiming Temple Vegetarian Restaurant

By Julia McBurney

- This marks the first in a short series of reviews of Nanjing's vegetarian restaurants, or at least a cross section thereof, conducted by a long-term vegan and plant-based food enthusiast, i.e. me.

As one of Nanjing's most prominent and well-established vegetarian venues, Jiming Temple Vegetarian Restaurant undoubtedly deserves a visit from all Nanjing expats. Operating since the 80's, this faithful vegetarian standby offers a variety of scrumptious mock meat dishes, ranging from soy-based chicken and steak to fish and conch. Having dined there this past spring and thoroughly enjoyed the experience, I was eager to return and curious to test the consistency in service and quality of cuisine.

For all the rave reviews I had heard from friends and acquaintances, coupled with my own previously positive assessment of the restaurant, the service during my most recent visit left much to be desired. When I entered the vegetarian haven for an evening meal, my presence was not even acknowledged for a good fifteen minutes. I seated myself, helped myself to a menu, and was finally approached by a waiter. He was polite and helpful, if not a bit patronizing, asking if I knew how to use chopsticks. As this restaurant attracts a good deal of tourists, this comment can also be viewed not as offensive, but simply as sensitive to people of different cultural backgrounds.

The food itself proved acceptable, and the vegetarian "meat" was quite satisfying, especially the vegetarian roasted goose over noodles (¥18). The braised tofu with vegetarian crab roe (¥32) marked my first experience trying vegetarian seafood, and the result was pleasantly surprising. The savory nature of the noodle and tofu dishes contrasted nicely with the slightly sweet yet tart mash yam with blueberry jam (¥32).

Before enjoying my meal, I was sure to take a few pictures of the dishes for use in The Nanjinger. Upon leaving, I requested a receipt for business purposes and proceeded to snap a few additional photos of the menu. Taking note of my business-like behaviour, the staff's attitude toward me shifted considerably, and they rushed to pour me an additional glass of tea, ushering me to a table to further study the menu.

The restaurant's peaceful ambiance and culturally rich surroundings partially compensate for the mediocre service. Jiming Temple and the Nanjing City Wall, which provides beautiful views of Xuanwu Lake, offer pre- or post-dinner activity possibilities. If Jiming Temple Vegetarian Restaurant improves its customer service, it could further raise its standing in the Nanjing vegetarian community.

Jiming Temple Vegetarian Restaurant is located at 1 Jimingsi Lu, near the Jiefang Gate of Xuanwuhu Park. NX

Apple Store

By Frank Hossack

■ Standing in Nanjing's first Apple Store, opened only a week prior, I chat with one of the many and very friendly members of staff. I tell him I have used only Apple computers all my life, that my university was the first in the UK to install the then Apple II for students' use throughout, and that yet, here today I enter an Apple Store for the very first time. My partner in conversation breaks out in spontaneous applause, joined by colleagues who have been listening in. More such outbursts of celebration occur in the store every few minutes. In celebration of what, I ask. "Anything", I am told; perhaps it is selling an iPhone, or fixing a busted computer. "We are Apple. We celebrate", he tells me. Fair enough, albeit a little unsettling. Sinister even, if George Orwell were to write about.

I am also informed that Beijing and Shanghai have four Apple stores apiece, while the fruit with the bite mark also has shops in Wuxi, Chongqing, Shenzhen, Guangzhou, Hangzhou and Chengdu. Therefore, what was initially something of a personal pilgrimage quickly became a series of nagging doubts. Why was Apple so late to the party in Nanjing? And why on Earth has it ended up with an almost dubious location on the first floor of Wonder City shopping mall, surrounded by Starbucks rip-offs? It is also just only one large room. If they can get a swanky set up on Nanjing Dong Lu in Shanghai, where is its flashy equivalent in Xinjiekou?

For starters, rumour has it that, prior to his disgraced downfall, former Nanjing mayor Ji Jianye was less than enthusiastic for the project. Yet, Apple continued to fancy our provincial capital with envious eyes; the company knowing very well Nanjing is a major hotbed for its devices, thanks to data revealed through product activations. When the change at the top came, Apple might as well have been standing outside, with their hands out.

While the Apple Watch is conspicuous for occupying the large display case that sits just inside the front door, the back of the store holds other, unexpected delights; the BB-8 by Sphero (the bluetooth controlled droid from the upcoming Star Wars VII) for one, as well as the usual selection of iPods and Dr. Beats headphones. Most staff have excellent English and as you would expect are on hand to assist with your purchase or experiencing of the product (I still can't get the watch to work).

Another store is on the way, but the current outlet's staff are remaining tight lipped about its location. The Nanjinger's money would be on either IST Mall on Changjiang Lu or the Nanjing International Centre. That is, if it all hadn't long ago found its way to Cupertino.

THE NANJINGER BUS TABLE

Notes on using The Nanjing Bus Table

This handy bus table is a cut down version of the entire Nanjing public bus system that focuses on parts of the city of interest to expats. If you are looking, for example, to travel from your home in Xianlin to Nanjing Railway station, look at the Xianlin area of the table (orange), then look to the right to see which lines run between the two locations. In this case number 97. Easy, huh?
