As we trail toward the end of another academic year, as for many in any way involved in education in Nanjing ready themselves for the annual exodus, so The Nanjinger too prepares for its bi-annual break. We shall return in August with a brand new look; we truly hope you will be joining us.

For some of our regular readers, however, the time too has come to say goodbye. We hope that Nanjing has been kind to you, and that you have one or two hilarious stories that shall never leave your memories.

Onto business. For the final issue of this season, The Nanjinger is getting all reflective.

We all know there are a lot of counterfeit goods in China; join Renee Gray as she analyses issues of trust (p10-12). Elsewhere, Angela Chen visits, as only a native can, the crossroads where forgiveness and vengeance meet (p14-16), while Michael Anclam discusses China's discourse on quality; the quality of people, that is (p I 8-19). Finally, this month's legal column has in it some practical advice for the bystander who can suddenly become not so innocent afterall.

Welcome to Mirror Mirror from The Nanjinger.

Mirror Fragments

Her first hand-mirror She sits in wonder. Eyes bright, lips plump and waiting To taste their first kiss.

A wedding mirror New name and new life: The daughter becomes a wife-And then a mother...

Self in a convex mirror The world she now sees, Through narrowed preconceptions, Proves that she is right.

Chance glance in a bathroom mirror Her ageing face glimpsed: Grey hair frames the wrinkled brow, As winter sets in.

A final mirror's breaking fall It caught the night's stars, Splintered into tiny sparks Then all became dark.

We at The Nanjinger often spend a vast amount of time contemplating, discussing and analising Chinese sociology. Laid out on the table this month is societal reflection and what that means for China. So often do we as humans (borders withdrawn) enjoy watching, laughing and poking fun at the misfortunes and foolishness of others; very rarely to we take a deep breath and shine the light on ourselves. After much deliberation, one of the main issues in China's modern era that stood out the most is Habitual Distrust.

Chinese habitual distrust is perceived as a rapidly growing social problem, not only among consumers, but greater society as a whole. As humans, a healthy amount of distrust is essential to survival. We would not dare pet a snake; we have no evidence of trust that it would not bite us. Instinctual distrust is needed, and it seems fair to say that in our modern society, riddled as it is with the all the darkness of Dante's inferno, we may all not only need instincts to protect ourselves and our loved ones, but we need learn caution as well.

As you are most likely aware, over the past 30 years, the Chinese consumer has suffered time and time again from the selling of "fake" goods. Used in this sense, it generally describes an item that is different in some way to the item the consumer thought they were buying. This can range from harmless "fakes", as unwillingly purchasing a pair of New Barlun's instead of New Balance, or strolling around bewildered in one of China's fake English or German "towns", to more sinister and frankly dangerous fakes, such as the practice of faking medicine or food.

In May 2017, a video on Weibo went viral which showed a group of people manufacturing fake Hennessey Whisky from their backyard; the very next day another video went viral in which Budweiser cans are taken straight from a bin, dipped into fake beer and the lid of the can melted back on, to be later packaged and sent to night clubs and KTVs all over Guangzhou. These are just the latest cases in an onslaught of fake foods, medicines, cars, electronics and even people.

It is therefore no wonder the word "Huyou" (忽悠), meaning "bamboozle", or "to trick or con", is used to describe this current state of hyper distrust. Bamboozlement at its all time high came with the not too far back baby milk scandal of 2008. A lack of food safety regulations saw the tainting of baby milk powder that had been adulterated with melamine; six babies died and 54,000 were hospitalized with kidney stones and kidney damage, while a further 12 babies died from malnutrition due to watered down milk. It was after this that parents seriously started looking abroad for food that they could trust.

Over the past 9 years scandals upon scandals such as this have helped give a final push for China's middle class to start seriously buying imported products. We have now a flourishing industry of overseas purchasing agents, big foreign-name supermarkets and serious brand awareness, all built on the backbone of increasing habitual distrust from a nation's affluenct middle class, demanding (and paying for) improved health.

Take a wander through one of the bigger Suguo supermarkets in your area and you will see standing in rank with other trusted Chinese trademarks, the Tesco brand. Big. bold and beautiful, it stands out among the rest and screams. "I'm foreign, cheap and trustworthy: choose me". And we do. British giant Tesco has taken their place among Chinese brands, cutting the need for direct overseas purchasing or online uncertainty. A great example of consumer trust in China is Jiangsu's, Vanguard owned, Suguo supermarket. Suguo is so well known and trusted throughout Jiangsu that the foothold it has over the region only leaves enough space for the mighty Tesco to join the queue to take up a place on the shelves of its supermarkets.

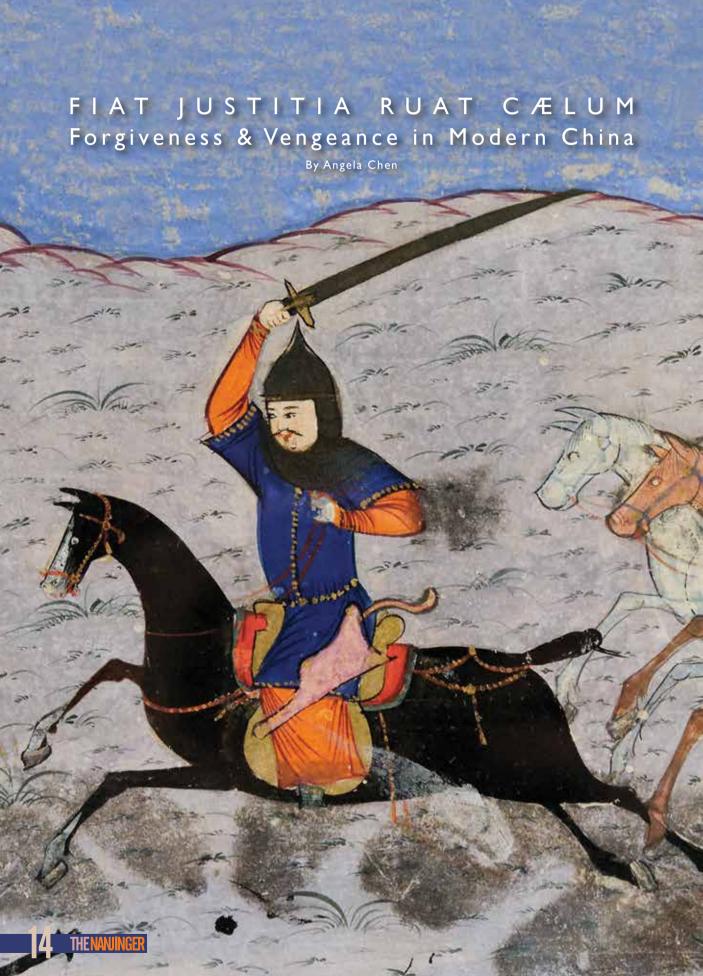

Just putting some English on a product no longer cuts it with China's ever-sophisticated consumer, which is why retail giants such as Vanguard have given them what they want; trust in a wellknown brand at affordable prices. Following suit is online marketing, consistently providing solutions to problems of distrust and dissatisfaction. As an example. Alipay has helped bridge the gap of distrust between merchants and buyers by introducing third party slow release payment options. Peer-to-peer testimonials are one of the best tools for sellers these days, with word of mouth coming in as the second best method of gaining trust. A study by Brand Karma showed that 42 percent of the worlds travel reviews are written by Chinese people, keen to share their experiences and inform fellow Chinese travellers of the dos and don'ts of travel.

While the consumer industry is getting its head around how to gain the trust of the Chinese people. China's civil service is lagging behind. A May 2017 survey conducted by The Nanjinger revealed 80 percent of people did not know whether they trusted the police and a further 70 percent of those surveyed said they would only trust a Chinese doctor with their life "depending on the doctor's reputation". Furthermore, the study exposed that 80 percent of people only "sometimes" trust government statistics, while 50 percent trust their close friends over family members.

Whether vast swathes of their reality, due to the bamboozlement of facts, figures or experience, are what fuel their distrust, or whether it is a deeply ingrained instinctual habit, the fact remains the same; gaining the true, unfiltered and genuine trust of a Chinese person and keeping it is complex and arduous.

I have wondered on many occasions if all Chinese people are born with a special type of DNA that contains a passive-aggressive brand of retaliation. To simply put it, we are a nation innately talented at holding grudges. Compared to Westerners, in whose culture a large emphasis is placed on forgiveness, are we just beings with more of a mean streak, or is it deeply ingrained in the roots of Chinese culture?

Our nation's culture certainly has its fair share of idiosyncrasies, and perhaps the hardest concept for foreigners to fully wrap their minds around is "face". A phrase you often hear in China is "saving face", or "losing face." The notion of face can be contrasted with Western notions of self-esteem. Whereas the individual is in control of their self-esteem, face is more similar to the idea of public-esteem, in the sense that it is granted by others.

In Western culture, a person with a high self-esteem is able to think positively about themselves, and can maintain this positivity even when receiving negative information about their character. Therefore, self-esteem is readily enhanced but hard to defeat. It is the opposite when it comes to face. Face is easy to lose, but hard to gain.

Tim MacDonald, the Founder and Managing Director of Chrysalis Consulting and columnist for The Nanjinger, at a recent TEDx talk in Nanjing, voiced his belief in forgiveness through recounting a tragic but revelatory car accident in his life.

The Chinese driver of the car that crashed into him was heavily drunk. Since driving after drinking is illegal in China, the insurance company had zero obligation to pay for any of the damage and the only choice left open to Mr. MacDonald was to sue both the driver and insurance company to repair the loss.

The insurance company ended up paying their debt, and the poverty-stricken family of the driver paid all they had, which was still not enough to fulfill the compensation. However, in court, Mr. MacDonald made the shocking decision to close the case and set the driver, who was now a prisoner, free.

Mr. MacDonald then proceeded to show a picture of his family to the driver, suggesting he may want to meet them, and said: "I totally forgive you." Not just for the money, but for almost taking his life.

Regardless of whether it was due to the cultural background in which Mr. MacDonald grew up that helped shape his beliefs, or due to the influence of other factors, he was kind enough to forgive. He understood that people make mistakes, but that everyone is redeemable, as long as we never give up hope.

This led me to think, if the roles were reversed, would we have done the same thing, or would we react in the way that comes naturally to us; to seek revenge?

Revenge, sadly, is very much part of the equation of bearing a grudge. One would think that we would be exhausted by now. But perhaps it has become such an inherent part of our everyday behaviour that it flows in the air we breathe.

The truth is, if you make someone lose face in China, you have probably created an enemy for life.

If you are an expat living in China who still think that avenging face-losing situations is just something you see in Chinese soap operas, you are either a newcomer to Chinese culture or blissfully ignorant; something that is not always a bad thing in China.

In Western culture, objectivity and facts are taught to be respected from a young age, and a person's integrity is valued more than anything else. If you admit your wrongdoings, take responsibility for your actions and learn from the past, Westerners are generally forgiving.

During his Presidential run, George W. Bush spoke openly about his addiction to alcohol. If a Chinese official did the same thing, the chances are he would be currently hiding under a rock, unable to recover from what he considers a devastating loss of face and a momentary indiscretion that jeopardized his political career forever.

Of course, it all comes down to face. There is not a direct translation for the meaning in Chinese; the closest would probably be along the lines of "pride", "dignity" or "prestige."

As a Chinese myself, I can give you the inside scoop on why we, frankly, hate to forgive.

When asking for forgiveness, Chinese people tend to think that it highlights our inferior moral position, and therefore we lose face. By offering forgiveness, we are also losing face as there is a feeling that we are relinquishing the right we have over someone.

We would rather blatantly lie to someone than risk having our egos bruised. Why, you ask? I don't completely know. But then again, human nature is the same everywhere, for better or for worse.

Is there ever a downside to the modern, saccharine Western routine of forgiveness? Everyone who has had some interaction with Western culture has heard the admonition "forgive and forget" at one point or another in their lives.

Believing in the prevailing good in someone is a value instilled in Western children from a young age, but does saying "I forgive you" truly liberate your brain, your soul, your karma and your heart?

Most of the time, we say it to make the people around us feel better and to deceive ourselves into believing that if we forgive, the universe will somehow work its magic and reward us with favorable karma.

Yet, smiling tight-lipped to mask your inner seething ball of anger is not called forgiveness. This is corrosion of the soul. We should also accept that not being able to forgive is just as valid an option.

This does not imply you have to paint the walls of your room black and dwell on your decision while listening to heavy metal music everyday.

Neither does it mean you are less strong or a less honourable person. It simply shows you acknowledge the balance of shrewd judgement and benevolent character, but you are still able to let go of the "bad stuff" and move on, this time with a real smile on your face.

Before we forgive, we should figure out which people are worth forgiving. Perhaps the wisest choice, then, is to take from both worlds; the reluctance to forgive and forget from Chinese culture, and the willingness to embrace the "water under the bridge" mentality of Western culture.

One thing the Chinese should learn from Westerners is that within each of us lies the limitless capacity to forgive.

It comes with practice and time, but ultimately, forgiveness is an acceptance that the painful scars we bear which speak of an unbearable time are a part of us. A small, silent, but indelible part.

It does not have to mean a lack of action, a dismissal of pain or a discounting of the difficulty of a situation. Forgiveness means we recognise that our deepest wounds and greatest agony can be transformed into something beautiful and full of hope.

It does not matter which side of the mirror you are on. No one should ever forget that.

POLITICS OF IMPROVEMENT; OILLA'S DISCOURSE ON QUALITY

By Michael Anclam

On some trains in China, a video is shown that visiting foreigners might find strange and even somewhat funny. Its message seems to be that one should not urinate on a Buddha statue, which, to most people appears to be a no-brainer.

Yet, videos such as this, with instructions on how to behave and not to behave in public, can be found in many places throughout Chinese cities. Some might consider this to be just one more of China's oddities. However, there is a whole societal discourse behind this kind of "public education".

The first time this phenomenon caught the eye of the wider Western press was probably during the forerun to the 2008 Summer Olympics in Beijing. The New York Times and the BBC rather gleefully ran stories, such as "No Spitting on the Road to Olympic Glory, Beijing Says" and "Olympic crackdown on China's bad habits", referring to efforts by the Chinese government as well as civilians to offer a more "presentable" and "civilised" picture of Beijing in the international spotlight.

Even today, the fruits of these public education campaigns can be found everywhere in China; the aforementioned Public Service Announcements (PSA) in trains and buses, murals, propaganda posters, notices in toilets (after all, "civilization begins here", says a sign in the toilets of Nanjing University's Zengxianzi Building, instructing men to stand closer to the urinals), that teach you to recycle and assist the elderly, and so on. Why does China seem so obsessed with appearing civilised, especially considering that it is one of the oldest civilisations on earth?

Some China scholars believe the answer lies in the discourse of "Suzhi" (素质) that permeates Chinese society.

Suzhi literally means "quality", but it expresses much more than the English term. According to Tamara Jacka, Professor at the Department of Political and Social Change at the College of Asia and the Pacific of the Australian National University, Suzhi is significant on both the broader social and individual level. It signifies education, behaviour, speech, consumption (of the right products) and urbanity. It intersects with, or is part of other discourses, like the one on "Wenming" (文明) or "civilization". While, according to Jacka, one important aspect of Suzhi is the education of children; it can be found in nearly every part of Chinese society; it also serves as an important category of difference, as in who has low and who has high Suzhi; rural migrants vs. urbanites, women vs. men, and so on.

There are different theories about the origin of this discourse. While some consider it a decidedly neo-liberal concept, connected to individualistic self-improvement and exposure to global culture, others, such as Gary Sigley, Associate Professor for Asian Studies at the University of Western Australia, believe it has older roots. The Suzhi discourse in its current form first appeared in the 1980s and 1990s, but according to Sigley, it is connected to Maoist politics of improvement.

These "politics of improvement" refer to the notion that human beings can be planned and improved through regulation, much like a socialist economy.

In any case, most scholars seem to agree that the underlying cause for the current discourse on Suzhi lies mainly with concerns, especially by elites, about a perceived "lack" of "quality" in Chinese people. Hence the aforementioned PSAs are all geared toward instructing people to behave in a more "civilised" manner, whatever that means. However, many, especially younger Chinese, consider these messages as not so important. "I personally wouldn't particularly pay attention unless they are pretty witty or reflect a social issue that I relate to", said Li Guanrong, a linguistics student from Shanghai. Li also noted that the messages have become more subtle and less direct in their instructions over the past years.

All these PSAs and other forms might seem silly and superfluous at first glance. However, they can be expressive of deeper social and cultural discourses and they can teach us a lot about what is important when considering proper behaviour in China, or rather that which is perceived and presented as proper behaviour.

...On his ten year stint with the two iconic brands and leading them into the Italian market, his personal forays into the world of entrepreneurialism, why Italians make the best designers and China's "One Belt One Road" initiative.

"I created Accessorize in Italy; it was not there before. We opened 40 shops. It was a fantastic adventure, because I set the cornerstone. The way to manage the people and the clients is very different from in England; you need adapt the UK culture to Italian culture.

"After doing an MBA at the Chicago School of Business in London, I felt I had enough experience and knowledge to be an entrepreneur. I have to admit I failed at my first try; I tried to sell in the UK through ecommerce. Luckily I lived in the UK, because a failure in Italy can kill you; a failure in the UK gives more opportunity. Investors feel that with a first failure there is a better chance to invest with you the second time. It's an incredible country, on that level.

"I followed the voice inside me, as I lived all my life around the world. So I'm concentrating on small and medium companies. Italy is full of small and medium companies that have no idea how to go abroad; they have no money, no organisation no culture. In China, there are many with the same problem. So I thought there was a need in the market, and I am fulfilling that. It's a need that cannot be fulfilled neither by importers; they want something ready to sell, they don't care anything about the brand; neither by Amazon or Alibaba; they want something ready online, these people don't even have a photo.

"Italy is lucky. We live in beautiful cities. I think the environment is very important. We have a tradition of mixing colour. If you see a wardrobe of somebody in Tuscany; not wealthy people, medium or lower class; it is covered in a cloth. This taste of dressing well, you have one suit but it lasts all your life. If you go to Florence, you see this mix of architecture that is 2,000 years old, the colours and the proportions are all there, and all this is in your culture every day. The food is great, the weather is great; all the elements [required] for creativity.

"We have America, Russia and Europe with everything that has been happening in the last 3 or 5 years. This, I think, brings diaster to world peace. I think the Chinese understood this and entered with the One Belt One Road plan. It is not only about making it possible to import from Europe to China, it is about infrastructure investment, in all these countries that in the last 50 years were killing each other. When infrastructure comes, labour comes, food comes, and when somebody has a full stomach, they stop fighting and start buying. This plan shows the maturity of China to lead the world in the future. I think this a step forward for future peace and future wealth. Young people should find jobs along this One Belt One Road. There will be thousands of jobs, in every nature, from trading, from engineering, from translation, this is a huge opportunity for the world. We cannot lose."

Hip-hopaganda This is China

Four young lads huddle round a mixing deck in Chengdu. Flat caps, groomed eyebrows and baby's bottom chins. They could be TF Boys in their twenties, but then again that would make it 2027. They are in fact a gangster rap band from Sichuan with a sizable domestic following, international fame, and a very unusual twist.

In their 2016 hit record "This is China", Chengdu Revolution (or CD Rev for short) avoided the usual gangster rap themes such as sex, drugs and fancy cars, opting instead to intone the glories of present-day China; of paying with phone apps, of the Shenzhou astronautical program and of Tou Youyou, China's Nobel prize winning chemist. But they also mention the serious stuff too; the 2008 melamine milk crisis, China's choking pollution and scandals involving the use of expired vaccinations.

"Regardless of all the prejudice in the past / Today I wanna restore the impression you have on my country, China / Which have been exactly fabricated by media for a long time." The lyrics open.

The four-minute video went viral clocking up over ten million views. Add to that another ten million mental repeats of that painfully cringe worthy and unavoidably catchy chorus and you can certainly call it something of a success.

"This is China, we love the country / We the Chi-phenomena / The red dragon ain't no evil but a peaceful place / The beautiful land with rich culture remain." It's that good that they even sing it twice.

Dubbed in the US as "China's nationalist gangster rappers", CD Rev rap for the Communist Youth League while three out of four band members have parents who were in the People's Liberation Army. But good old fashioned red and white slogans just don't make the cut anymore and CD Rev's lyricist and singer, Li Yijie, sees their music as a solution.

The party loving group is not alone in its venture, however, as state media companies and organisations seek to carve out a new identity for China in foreign media and to attract young Chinese who are increasingly uninterested in politics. What better way to do that than with catchy animated pop songs?

The 2015 release of "Shisanwu" (十三五), proved to have unfathomable success, despite being a cartoon jingle about one of the driest topics one can think of; China's 13th Five Year Plan. Sung in English, the video follows an animated 2D band as they travel through a montage of iconography singing merrily, but with terrible pronunciation, about the "shisanwu".

There is all sorts of imagery targeted at young audiences such disco balls, rubber ducks, electric guitars and a retro dog with pilot goggles riding a motorbike. A hefty helping of abominable humour goes down a treat for all the wrong reasons, in particular the square green lollipop holding robot representing an engineer who "deals with poo".

But success is erratic, and if determined by viewer numbers, then there is still much room for improvement. Just last month ahead of Xi Jinping's Belt and Road Forum (otherwise known as BARF), CCTV's international channel released a video in which young children dressed in white sing and strum, "The future's coming now, the belt and road is how". As a multicultural gaggle of children summarise the key points of Xi's $900 billion initiative, pink camels and yellow forklifts come and go like a popup book for the not yet literate. It's unforgivingly patronising.

Scraping less than two thousand views on Youtube, this one was a flop and proof that while China's new hip-hopaganda trend may be picking up some speed, it still faces a long and complicated road, and belt, to success.

In a previous entry for Strainer, we explored the use of green tea as an additive in various processed goods; from skin creams to air fresheners to slimming pills to ice cream.

We explored how seldom it is the flavour of the green tea that qualifies it as capable of "adding value", which, by the way, usually means added shareholder wealth, not added customer pleasure.

We explored how green tea carries connotations of "healthfulness" to most people in most countries, as well as ambitious health claims for anyone who cares to seek them out.

We discussed the greenness of the stuff, noting how customers connote nature, trustworthiness and mildness in almost anything thus tinged.

Finally, we noted how green tea has been used as a trope for Asian-ness. That's dessicated Zen-wisdom to a western customer, respect for local industry to a Chinese customer.

In many ways, it's the win-win scenario so beloved of diplomats. The green tea of green tea extract doesn't need to be matcha-grade; it doesn't need to be the spring-picked, tips-only, high-altitude ambrosia I wrote about in this column last month. It need only be green-ish and come from camellia sinensis. High profit margins. Becalmed customers.

This additive role for green tea is a relatively new one. And in many ways it has assumed this role by supplanting a former favourite leaf; mint.

Mint, for all its penetrating vim and pep, lacks the functional connotations of green tea. Mint is a mere flavour. But if mint has been prominent for long enough to fall out of favour, might green tea also suffer a similar fate eventually?

The reason I ask this is because I have noticed a new theme on the supermarket shelves; bamboo salt. This rewards a little research because the story is a good one.

Salt is sourced from evaporated sea water, then stuffed into pipes of hollow bamboo. A blob of local clay forms a bung on each end. At least an equal weight of timber is felled, burned to roast the bamboo. The kiln reaches 1,000-1,500°C, leaving no visible trace of the plant. The solid bung discs are discarded, the grey, ashen salt heated again to a temperature that turns it into lava.

The clear cooled salt resembles something from Breaking Bad. Only if this is repeated several times (nine is auspicious) does it take on the purple hue of the most prized versions.

That's probably not the version that goes into the toothpaste in Carrefour and Auchan. But this is already a fabulagenic, energy-intensive, unlikely process that's hard to forget.

It trumps green tea in terms of novelty and sheer Asian-ness. As an icon on a cardboard box, it seems green and natural and caring enough. And the health claims, from headache alleviation to enlightened immortality, more than match the ambitions of the green function powder. It also helps, for now, that this is a product associated with Hallyu and South Korean Cool.

How can green tea possibly compete? As an industrial additive, the game may soon be up.

But as a beverage, it beats purple brine every time.

Avocado Affluence

NUTRITIONAL LAURACEAE'S RAPID GROWTH IN CHINA

By Renee Gray

Just as avocados helped lift the social status of Britain's newly affluent middle class of the 1970s, it is now beginning to rain down prestige on China's new middle class in the same way. It acts as a symbol of wealth, health and status and to have an avocado in your shopping trolley is becoming a must have.

As the world's largest producer and birthplace of avocados, Mexico has traditionally traded first and foremost with the United States. As a result of recent threats made by President Trump to tear up the 1994 North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA), and among other reasons this may now change.

Mexicans seem untendered, instead keen to pursue a much larger, hungrier market, China. Mr. David Smith from SVA fruits Shanghai spoke with The Nanjinger and said, "We have strong partnerships directly with the growers and exporters in all three countries of origin... We source from Mexico, Chile, and Peru. [Our aim is to] offer consistent, year-round supply." For the last 5 years Mexican avocado professionals have been hustling the Chinese market. Holding fancy events in order to promote their products, and going to great lengths to educate the Chinese people about the health benefits of the fruit.

Partly due to this, avocado imports have skyrocketed and almost doubled per annum over the last few years. Ramon Paz of the Association of Producers, Exporters and Packers of Avocados from Mexico, has recently said that Mexico exported 470 metric tons in the 2012-13 seasons and it jumped up to 11,000 tons in the 2015-16 season.

In addition to Mexico's soaring market within China, both Chile and Peru are beginning to make waves within the industry. Both countries have the advantage of a free trade agreement with China, and although Mexico's tariffs have just been reduced from 25 to 10 percent this year, the introduction of Peruvian Hass avocados and Chilean produce will certainly strengthen the market. "The market growing the fastest is China. It's still not big, but it is doubling consumption every year", Paz said.

With China's middle class becoming aware of the versatile health benefits of avocado consumption, so have large food chains as well. This year both KFC and McDonalds have added an "avocado range" of burgers to their menus in efforts to appeal to the middle class. Avocados used for fast food chains and big restaurants in China are sourced mainly from Mexico.

Up until now buying avocados as a consumer in China has been hit and miss due to unripe and overpriced produce. Californian based Mission Avocados, recently completed construction on China's first Ripe Center dedicated to avocados. This center will aim to allow the fruit time to ripen and sell directly to customer's fresh and ready to eat. "What they've done is absolutely an important step by bringing in the right technology and trying to do it the right way, not trying to guess at it," said Mr. Smith.

However, not all avocado sellers feel the need to sell the fruit ripe just yet, "This is something that is a work in progress and will take a lot of time and education of the retailers and consumers about the benefits of selling ripe avocados. As it is, a dark, soft, ripe, ready to eat avocado in the market is a huge risk to any wholesale distributor and they really don't want to manage that sort of fruit, they would rather keep managing emerald green avocados that, although they aren't ready to eat and won't be for any predictable period of time, are much easier to manage as they have a long shelf-life." said Mr. Smith.

Mission Avocado president Steve Bernard expressed his excitement about the opening of the center claiming it will be able to "accelerate market growth". Located near the Yangtze River the center has 4 ripe rooms with a capacity of 80 pallets of ripening space.

"My hope is that this leads consumers to a better understanding of how and when to eat avocados. Once people know about [it] the market will certainly grow. Mission Avocados did a great job of this in the US many years ago. I suspect that if their facility gains traction, you will see a lot of companies rushing to do the same thing and investing in ripening facilities," Mr. Smith commented.

Dramatic climate changes of El Niño last year have severely affected avocado growth in Mexico and have dragged out the dry low season longer than necessary. As a result avocado prices around the world including China have risen, almost doubling in price. All is not over in China as she immediately begins sourcing elsewhere.

Some in the industry suspect it is only a matter of time before China finds a way to produce its own avocados, citing there is plenty of space and potential (48 million hectares) in Southern China with favourable weather conditions to start planting.

Shenzhen based company Kondarl recently announced to the stock exchange that it was close to signing a deal to acquire Australia's largest avocado farm for Yıb. Unfortunately, Kondarl will have to wait some time due to China's clamp down on money leaving the country. If the deal goes through this could potentially lower the cost of avocados on the market for sale in China.

BBQ SAUCE

■ I am writing this column back home in the UK and summer has finally begun. When it stops raining and the sun makes a full appearance in the sky, people will flock to their local supermarket to buy a plethora of meat and veg to throw a great British barbecue.

For a change, I wanted to try and replicate flavourful, Chinese BBQ food at home. My research showed that marinades are widely used to help create an even richer smokier flavour, and the condiment that makes the base of most of the sauces is hoisin. I decided to use this base sauce to make the well known classic which is admittedly my favourite Chinese BBQ dish, "Char Siu" pork. Here is the best recipe I created:

- 800g pork loin
- 5 tbsp. hoisin sauce
- 3 tbsp. light soy sauce
- 2 big garlic cloves (peeled and finely chopped)
- 2cm piece ginger (peeled and chopped into matchsticks)
- 1 star anise
- 4 tsp caster sugar
- 2 tbsp. honey
- ½ tsp five spice powder

Make sure you do buy pork loin and not pork belly. Pork loin is also much cheaper in China too so win-win for you!

Mix all the ingredients, aside from the pork, in a bowl until the ingredients have combined to make a marinade. Place the whole pork loin in the bowl, smother and massage the mixture over the pork. Leave the pork in the bowl with the marinade, cover the bowl with cling film and put into the fridge for a minimum of 4 hours. Preferably you should leave it overnight to ensure maximum flavour when cooked.

When you are ready to cook your pork, preheat an oven to 210 degrees. Remove it from the fridge and leave it to get to room temperature. Line a baking tray with some tin foil and place the pork on the tray. Poor the marinade over the pork and once the oven is heated, place into the oven for 10 minutes.

Reduce the heat to 170 degrees, and cook for another hour, ensuring you turn the pork and baste with the marinade every 10-15 minutes. When cooked, remove from the oven and leave to rest for 10 minutes. Then it is ready to serve.

Now I have to say, this was my favourite dish to cook by a mile. The meat was so succulent; it just melted in the mouth and had the intense, smoky flavour I would expect from Char Siu pork. It can easily serve 4-6 people and was a real crowd pleaser with all my friends and family back at home.

I do understand this recipe is flawed for most of you expats back in Nanjing.... Chinese kitchens don't really have ovens... I do apologise if you don't have one! I bought a mini one when I was there off Taobao and it was money well spent, so if you are a foodie like me, definitely invest in one.

Aside from the pork loin, what I have provided you with is an amazing marinade and sauce that can be used for pretty much anything. You can marinade and fry chicken wings with it; create Char Siu pork chops simply fried on the hob; give amazing depth of flavour to any meat or veggie stir fries and rice dishes.

Whilst, yes you may have to wait to try my char Siu pork loin when you get back home, please don't wait around to try out this amazing sauce on almost anything else at home in China.

Persevering Through the Heat

■ Each year about this time, residents of Nanjing love to remind each other of the foreboding heat that is about to descend upon the city. You will often hear the comment, "You know, Nanjing is one of the four furnace cities in China; it's going to be hot this summer!"

While folklore includes Nanjing as a top "furnace" city, the meteorology data collected over the last 30 years of the "hottest cities in China" (as reported by China Weather Television on 16 July 2013) dropped Nanjing down the list to number 14.

Is this not often the case? When we look at the data and examine facts, that which we fear is often not as bad as we had imagined.

This is true for many challenges in life. Often voices around us will tell us what can be done, and what cannot be done. Usually, these voices base their input on minimal facts, maximal opinions and limited experience.

In order to thrive in life, it is absolutely essential that we learn the fine art of persevering.

History provides us of many examples of those that have persevered through the "heat" to accomplish the "impossible", resulting in significant contributions to the world.

Socrates. Considered one of the greatest thinkers the Classical Era; his contemporaries completely rejected his musing. In fact, he was sentenced to death because his "newage ideas" branded him "an immoral corrupter of youth".

Henry Ford. Prior to founding Ford Motor Company, he overcame bankruptcy five times with failed ventures.

Vincent Van Gogh. While alive, was was able to sell one painting. He persevered to paint over 800 other pieces, while starving and often destitute. Today his "unappreciated" work sells for hundreds of millions dollars.

Albert Einstein. Not considered a "boy genius", his parents and teachers began to think he was mentally handicapped and socially awkward due to that fact he did not begin to speak until the age of 4 or read until he was 7.

Jack Ma. Experienced years of failure; 3 times rejected entrance to university in China, 10 times rejected from Harvard. After completing university, received 30 rejections when applying for a job, experienced 2 failed ventures. Then in 1999 he started Alibaba. Now worth >US$30 billion.

Elon Musk. Founder of X.com (later Paypal), SpaceX, Tesla, Solar City, Neuralink and more, Musk has persevered many times through insurmountable odds; auto crash, deathly bout of cerebral malaria, being ousted as CEO twice, 3 failed launches of rockets, etc. Now worth >US$16 billion.

TIME FOR A HOLIDAY FROM THE HEAT?

How about you? Are you experiencing a difficult patch? Is the work you are doing seem to be impossible? Are there voices around you telling it is impossible; that it will never work?

Perhaps it is time to find a new data set. Gain additional input from voices that have a different perspective.

It might even be time to take a brief break from the heat. Head to the beach. Head to the mountains. Go to an interesting conference. Surround yourself with new voices. Remind yourself of what you are really trying to accomplish; what is your end game?

Then return to the heat – and persevere. Your company needs you to. Your family needs you to. The world needs you to.

Squid, Wasabi, Beer & Regency

By Renee Gray

Japanese food in Nanjing is not difficult to find; an array of good, authentic and affordable Japanese food is. That is why we at the Nanjinger absolutely loved our visit to the newest kid on the block; Fujiwara.

Located downtown where Guangzhou Lu meets the end of Ninghai Lu, opposite Nanjing Normal University, and directly next door to lively Vie Chat, Fujiwara features large circular doors open inwards as you enter the restaurant. Staff is attentive but seem to refrain from hovering.

Do not be fooled by the rather small downstairs seating area as this restaurant has space to fill well over 100 people. Downstairs and up, tables are hidden behind bamboo sliding glass doors, curtains or lamps.

Sticking to an authentic feel the restaurant offers only

Japanese beverages. Bottle and draft beer is available; the cheapest glass of lager is ± 20 . Plum wines and whisky is also available along with a large selection of sake, fruit iuice and various tea options.

At around ¥20 per sushi option a selection of the bite sized morsels is affordable and filling. The Nanjinger tried much loved favourites including; the California roll and tuna and pickle and tried out some of the house favourites; the smoked duck and and a crispy crab roll which were all served fresh and delicious.

Other menu highlights included; fresh salmon, baked creamy lobster, steak with Himalayan salt, fried prawns, cheese and tomato stacks and traditional drinking accompaniment – squid pickled in wasabi (goes well with beer).

If munching away at all of that still does not hit the spot, on the menu is a selection of Japanese fried rice and udon noodles, soups and salads. Excluding drinks, a selection of various sushi dishes, sashimi and meat dishes will probably come to around ¥150 per person.

Upstairs boasts private rooms accommodating for 12 people and one large area that can accommodate for around 20 people. Call ahead to book and you can receive a free pudding. At present the menus are in Chinese, however, as of next month all menus will have been translated into English. Fujiwara is expecting to open their second restaurant in the same area later this year.

Fujiwara is located at 228-2 Guangzhou Lu 广州路易发科技大厦228-2号. Tel: 83111388 / 83311377. ■

Nanjing's (Non) Irish Pub

By Alex Szabo

If it's an authentic Irish drinking experience you are after, well, best book a plane to Ireland. But if you crave good vibes, live music, and green space? Nanjing's own Irish Pub will do quite nicely.

Located just past Goldstar Cafe off of Shanghai Lu, Irish Pub is a red-headed stepchild that doesn't quite live up to its name. It's not quite Irish - serving a wide variety of Western dishes - not is it strictly a pub. The layout more closely resembles a house, leading to a variety of unique dining areas. Live music fills the first floor rooms in the evenings, while televised sports rules the upper floor. The biergarten out back, however, is the real winner when it comes to atmosphere. There's literally not a bad seat in the house, or out back, for that matter!

Most Western food items, from salads and sandwiches to pizza and pasta to grilled meats and mashed potatoes, are faithfully executed, while oddly enough, Irish Pub lays claim to the largest pizzas in Nanjing with the biggest coming in at a whopping 22 inches! This makes for a great deal on half-price Wednesdays, so long as you bring a few hungry friends.

Of course, no pub is complete without alcohol, and here Irish Pub lives up to its name. The pub delivers with a large European beer selection, in addition to a decent wine selection and a recently redone cocktail list.

Irish Pub very much feels like a slightly-off Chinese translation; it doesn't quite hit all the specifics, but it certainly gets the point across well. The establishment really nails the feeling of neighborhood community that good pubs have, and even does so with a solid menu to boot! This feeling, often lacking in busy Nanjing, cannot be overstated. The vibe is what elevates Irish Pub to more than a place you visit once just for kicks; it makes it the kind of place where you become a regular. See you there!

Irish Pub is located at 29 Nanxiu Cun, off Shanghai Lu 上海路南秀村29号.Tel: 85439898.

Taking a Dip in 40 Soups

By Frank Hossack

The breadth and range of leisure options in Nanjing continues its dizzyingly upward spiral, and little proves this point better than 40 Soups, a new style of Japanese Spa in Pukou.

Rooms come in varying sizes, right up to one accompadating eight, presumably very friendly, people. At time of writing, family size rooms (2-4 people) are available at ± 158 on weekdays and ± 218 on weekends for a 2 hour period, which is frankly long enough.

Simple Japanese light meals are delivered to one's room; part of the fun being having to get out of the hot tub in order to answer the door.

Available seperately are a number of family foot baths and a communual outside option which, with the Chrysanthemum in bloom, appears to be utilised more as a photo op backdrop for the ladies in their kimonos that come as part of the package.

The only major downside is the far flung location, which rules it out for those without cars. A taxi would be prohibitively expensive (unless all those very friendly people share); heck, it would worth hiring a car for the day.

40 Soups Spa (四十汤) is located on the northern slopes of Lao Shan National Park 水墨大埝风景区九曲水街 AO3栋 .Tel: 58234440. ■

After a good year in which numbers in the Nanjing Rockets Rugby Club youth and women's sections grew quickly and the adult men's contact team came second in the Sino 10's league, it was a time to relax at the Great Gatsby/1920's themed end-of-season dinner at the Tang Restaurant in Jiangning.

Early Years students putting on Nanjing International School's fantastic "Stella the Starfish" show were expressive, energetic and enthusiastic throughout their time on stage, while they developed their confidence, creativity and cooperation skills throughout the production process.

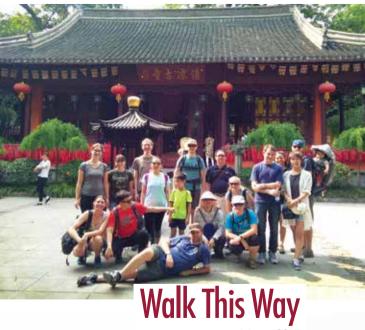

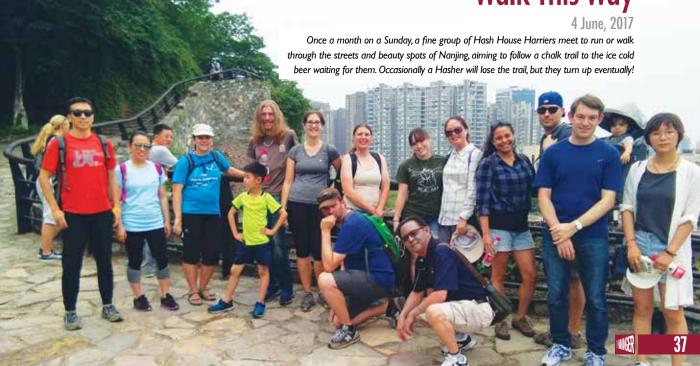

Many listings herein include handy codes as to their Nanjing Zone; a coloured square that assists in sourcing places of interest in areas frequented by expats. Cross reference the listings with the maps towards the rear of The Nanjinger.

To Help or Not to Help?

Before you came to China, you must have been given some advice regarding Do's and Don'ts in China. Among the advice, wasn't there a piece of advice not to help a fallen aged man/woman, unless you are rich?

There have indeed been cases of "helping the elderly" that caused significant repercussions in China, in which the defendants all claimed they were just helping the fallen to get up. They ended up being sued. The results of subsequent rulings were not in the defendants' favour

However, in one of the most influential cases, the defendant admitted a few years later that he really did hit the elderly person, while in the other cases, there was indirect evidence showing that the plaintiffs' injury was indeed related to the defendants' behaviour. They (the defendants) were not as innocent as they first appeared.

Of course, it is undeniable that some people who have acted as good samaritans have been sued for compensation in China. In the past two years, however, most cases have been clarified either by cameras or witnesses, but there were still a small number of the disputes couldn't be clarified.

Then should we help or not help when we see someone who obvious is in need?

In China, the general civil litigation burden of proof is "who advocates, who proves", whereby the parties concerned shall be responsible for providing evidence to prove the facts on which their own allegations are based, or the facts on which the allegations of the other party are refuted.

Where any party cannot provide evidence or the evidence produced cannot support the facts on which the allegations are based, the party who bears the burden of proof shall pay the consequences. In other words, if the fallen wants to claim against you, they need to prove that their fall and the injury was caused by you; if the counter party cannot prove it, the court shall not order you to bear the liability.

However, it is important to note that the situation is different if you are driving a vehicle. In traffic disputes between a motor vehicle and a non-motorised vehicle or pedestrian, the burden of proof is inverted, which means, the motor vehicle driver can only reduce their liability by proving that the other party is in the wrong

From the legal point of view, unlike some countries, helping people in need is not a legal obligation of citizens but the traditional morality in China, so we should help from the moral point of view. China's legislators are furthermore promoting and encouraging this good ethos in the form of legislation. In accordance with Article 184 of the General Principles of Civil Law of the People's Republic of China issued on 15 March, 2017 (effective from 1st October, 2017), in the case victim damage caused by voluntary implementation of emergency relief, the rescuer shall be exempt from civil liability.

Therefore, from a humane and moral point of view, it is still suggested to give a hand to someone in need. From the legal point of view, if you are concerned about potential risk, you can do the followings before entering the fray:

- (i) Ask other people nearby to assist you, or at least get their attention so they may become potential witnesses in the future:
- (ii) Call 110 for police or 120 for emergency ambulance before you get close;
- (iii) Take pictures or video before you get close;
- (iv) If you are driving a vehicle, make sure to park your car at a distance from the scene.
